Megna had always been a quiet kid. But at age 7, she underwent an abrupt transformation. She had suddenly become very withdrawn - almost frightened. She stopped going out to play with the other kids; she would retreat when guests came over to visit; and her class teacher said she had stopped participating in class discussions. She had also inexplicably developed vitiligo, a condition akin to leucoderma, where white patches begin to appear on the face and body.

Megna's mother also said the child had become very moody. She was loving and caring and then, with no apparent reason, she would turn obstinate and impatient and even defiant. Her mother said this was very unusual for a child who had always been obedient and well-behaved.

The child had also suddenly begun to wet her bed 7 months before I met her in my clinic. Her distraught parents had visited an allopath, who had prescribed some medication, which "did not work".

During the course of my treatment, it transpired that, one day, Megna was trapped in the elevator with a courier delivery boy, who had attempted to lift her up. This proved extremely traumatic for the vulnerable child, who went into shock.

This also explained her sudden fright, withdrawal and bedwetting. After this incident, the child refused to leave home without being accompanied by her parents. On occasion, she would fear that there was "someone following her".

Significantly, the white patches on Megna's face appeared soon after the incident in the elevator.

Treatment Little Megna's mind and body were desperate-she could find emotional release as well as heal physically. Without any counselling, I treatly trying to cope with trauma. She had gone into shock. The trauma was so great for her vulnerable mind that she began to wet her bed and her body had stopped producing melanin, a natural skin pigment.

Treatment reversed the cellular trauma the girl had sustained so that ed Megna at the genetic and biochemical levels, so that she was freed of her cellular shock.

In a couple of weeks, quite literally, the colour began to return to Megna's face — her vitiligo began to disappear. Megna's temperament also began to pick up. She became less withdrawn till she returned to her "usual self" and, as is always the case with my patients — Megna began to smile again!
